LAST UPDATED INFORMATION: Release date: 2017/07/06Role of a putative amino acid residue in the structural basis for the substrate preference of aspartic proteinases. In order to analyze the role of the bulky residues in substrate specificity, we have substituted for residue 203 in the substrate-binding site of bovine pepsin a number of amino acids of varied size. All substitutions resulted in a decrease in the kcat of the reaction with pepstatin A. The best inhibitor of aspartic proteinases [the basic amino acid residues (serine, arginine, and lysine) and (5-methylcysteine)] as well as aproton, argininamide-histidine, and carboxyamide derivatives are derivatives of pepstatin A. The binding of the best inhibitor (a proton) to bovine pepsin decreased more than 5-fold as the residue 203 was replaced with a bulky hydrophobic amino acid (methionine). Replacement of the residue by glutamine resulted in a decrease in the rate of hydrolysis of a model substrate

Q: How to recognize that a developer has won the three main Stack Overflow competitions? I just started following the SO competitions, however, I got the idea that Stack Overflow has some kind of awards that the winners can get awards like nobleness on their profiles. How do we recognize that a developer has won one of the three main Stack Overflow competitions? A: It's extremely easy to get to 100 points during any one of the pilot events. If it happens that they happen to coincide with some competitive event or other, it does not hurt that much since the competition only lasts a week, then it's largely forgotten about, as there is no good way to show your progress, especially after the initial week, because at that point, the quality of answers has largely returned to where it was after the initial competition. If you want to know when the pilots end, the next event after a pilot ends is called the grinder. The most likely grinder to mark your progress would be the next few Stack Overflow Jobs events. Signal recognition particles play multiple roles in quality control during eukaryotic protein synthesis. Actual progress in understanding the molecular basis of protein biosynthesis has been hampered due to the lack of a reliable and efficient protein synthesis system in eukaryotic cells. Recently, a key discovery was made in the discovery of signal recognition particles (SRPs) as the quality control system in protein biosynthesis. SRPs bind translating ribosomes and are responsible for nearly every translation-dependent aspect of eukaryotic protein biosynthesis. In budding yeast, SRPs are responsible for preproteins, until their signal peptide is matured after emerging from the ribosome. In addition, several yeast mutants have been discovered by screening for defects in preprotein release and SRPs have been purified, providing better tools for functional analysis in higher eukaryotes. These discoveries shed new light on the complex eukaryotic protein biosynthesis and should promote progress in biological and medical studies.A typical example of selective electrochemical determination of a metal ion in a sample solution, such as a physiological solution
