Ensiklopedia populer tentang Gereja Katolik di. 42 (4), 564-582.Q: How to stop a timer when another timer reaches zero I am using the following code to create a timer for a very short period of time every 50ms, but I don't want the code to be executed when timer1 is running and even though it may not reach its target I don't want the next timer2 to kick in. Is there a way to solve this? Thanks

This invention relates to atomic frequency standards, and more particularly to a rotation-generated lattice-pinned gyromagnetic resonance detection system having a high resolution. Conventional atomic frequency standards require a high degree of frequency stability and low drift. Because of the small contribution to the total atomic Hamiltonian from the external classical magnetic field applied to the atoms, experimental perturbations of atomic energy levels can be avoided. Instead, atoms become detectable and measurable for their effect on the free precession of the gyromagnetic ($B_{\text{sub}0}$) vector of a magnetic species in a magnetic field. A description of the physics of gyromagnetic resonance (gyromagnetic resonance or G.R.) phenomena and the general principles of atomic frequency standards can be found in the article entitled "Precise Frequency Measurements Using Magnetic Resonance" by A. Sessler and C. L. Cesar, published in the American Journal of Physics, Vol. 50, No. 9, p. 879-881, September 1982. In gyromagnetic resonance measurements, the magnetization of a species is rotated by the magnetic field of a beam of radio frequency energy which is supplied to the atomic species at the angular frequency ω of precession. The envelope of the induced fluorescence is detected and the amplitude and frequency of the signal compared to predetermined values. To date, atomic frequency standards have been based on the ground state hyperfine splitting of alkali metals. In atomic systems utilizing the hyperfine splitting, the gyromagnetic excitation-relaxation processes are very sensitive to external magnetic fields. Since the magnitude f988f36e3a
