Photoshop CS5 offers some exciting new features after the redesign and re-introduction of the program in mid-2010. Among them: It's easier to retouch images after you've taken your original photography, whether it's using new Photoshop commands or traditional editing tools like the Brush, Gradient and Eraser or Photoshop effects such as the Liquify tool and the Spherical and Fisheye filters. The introduction of Photoshop Elements 11 in April means simplified image editing as well as a way to access Photoshop features via the new Elements.

See the review at CreativeReview The program now offers you 32 panorama bases. You can use your smart card to lock those groups for non-editable use. You also may now remain within Photoshop for much longer than before. HSync and VSync Word now uses a wider range of 373 Hz-1,000 Hz. The program also offers several new output and design features. WorkFlow, an interface for web, mobile and desktop publishing, is also available, and online galleries are now more powerful. New features include a smart layers palette, a new file format for printing layout, a new crop tool that makes cropping easy, and the ability to edit Variable Linked Clones.

See the review at Photoshop.com The biggest sticking point for me is when you have to be a bit braindead for Photoshop to be of any use. I have to be completely off-line to do anything truly creative with Photoshop, because they don't handle the Internet well. And the fact that you have to be a bit braindead means that you won't be buying a Photoshop copy for your family. Here's a recent example: I was working on a Windows networking project at the time and I ran into a firewall problem that I solved in several ways. One of the ways was to edit an existing file in another partition, but I realized that, for some reason, Photoshop would not recognize that I had other files on the system in a different partition. I had to be offline to get Photoshop working right again. "Yes," I thought, "I'm going to have to spend several days offline, and that could be counterproductive in a project deadline, but I know that I'll be back online in a few days."
